

KYE!

Do not contrive or elaborate the awareness of this present moment!

Allow it to be just as it is.

Awareness does not exist or not not exist, does not have a direction and is not born. It has no location or destination. It does not discern or analyze. It is not nothing nor is it anything.

Within this state, it is unnecessary to exert effort, try to see the view or meditate.

The great primordial liberation is not like being released from bondage.

It is natural radiance, uncontrived by the intellect, a wisdom unsullied by concepts.

The true nature of all things is not seen by the view or meditation. It is even resting without meditating. It is there in daily life without planning.

It is clarity without characteristics, a vastness that is never ordinary. Although all beings have never been separate from their own nature, their own indwelling wisdom, even for an instant, they fail to recognize this, like a natural flow of water solidifies into ice.

With the inner grasping mind as the root cause and the outer clinging to objects as the contributing circumstance, beings wander endlessly in samsara.

Now, with the oral instructions, encounter awareness! At that moment, rest in the way things truly are, beyond concept, without wavering from or meditating on anything.

Your mind has always been the primordial Buddha. Even if you searched in the ten directions, you could not find a Buddha more awake than this.